Perfected Over Time

Perfeccionado Con El Tiempo

It seems like yesterday my brothers and I were running through the hillsides of Mexico where beautiful agave plants sprouted in every direction. I can still clearly see the alluring agave, with its thick pointed leaves and robust piñas. I remember the large Blue Agave plants that towered over me as I ran through the fields. My father would tell us that the agave plants meant so much to the Mexican culture because it symbolized the combined works of nature and humankind. The agave plant expresses a history, spanning over hundreds of years, of a long and intimate relationship between the people and their natural environment.

Just as an agave plant takes many years of nurturing and cultivating, so did my boxing career. As a six-time world boxing champion, I often times compared my success to the lifecycle of an agave and how it was not a quick process, but one that took many years to reach full maturity. I feel proud to say my path was not easy, but with hard work and dedication, I became a Mexican boxing legend. Now that my boxing career is behind me, I'm focused on developing a world-class tequila.

I am proud of my tequila, and I want to share it with the world!

"A champion enters a new ring."
- J.C. Chavez

Harvest

After eight to ten years of care, the agaves are hand selected at the peak of maturity, then cut by Jimador's. The process consist of cutting the long leaves leaving only the heart of the plant which is called the "piña".

Cooking

The agave piñas are steam-cooked in large autoclaves, where temperature and pressure can be controlled at all times, slowly cooking the piñas to the optimum point, leaving them with a unique sweet aroma.

Milling

After perfect cooking, the agave hearts are moved to the milling area. The cooked agave is then shredded and the juice is extracted. The juice at this point is called "mosto". With this raw material the mosto is formulated for the fermentation.

Fermentation

Fermentation takes place through the cultivation and control of the agave yeasts. It consists of transforming the agave juice's sugar into alcohol. This process takes between 48 to 72 hours, carefully controlling the temperature levels in order to get the highest quality of base for distillation.

Distillation

Once fermentation is over the agave juice is then distilled once, which is known as ordinary. Tequila requires a second distillation before it can be called tequila and the process is strictly controlled to obtain the highest quality alcohol without compromising the taste and aroma of the cooked agave.

Aging

The aging process is very important so the barrels are carefully selected. Depending on the style of tequila and the type of tequila the time in the barrel is an important stage. Blanco is an un-aged spirit but Reposado will rest in American and French oak barrels for up to six months and Añejo will rest for over one year.
